THE CADETSHIP SCANDAL.

Nothing intelligible concerning the cadetships was obtained to-day. One witness testified that he made an arrangement to have a cadetship for a Mrs. Perry, from Rhode Island, appointed from North Carolina, and that the nomination was made; that before its formal execution Mr. Dawes objected to it, and that he had to use it to get a boy of a State Senator from a purpose, to get Mrs. Perry's appointment from a purpose, to get Senator Ramsdell, that Senator also agreed, in consideration, to vote for a Democratic Senator before the Legislature. The witness testified to the appointment from Rockford, and complained in his letter that he had been cheated without consideration. The same witness testified that he arranged with Mr. Whittemore, of South Carolina, for the appointment of his son by Mr. Whittemore's sponsors before the committee, that the boy was not examined as stated, but without examination was appointed as cadet, and that Whittemore was to pay him $1,000 for his services. Commodore Upham, of the Navy, who has been examined before the committee, testified that he was examined for admission to the Naval Academy by Mr. Whittemore, of South Carolina for an appointment of his son by Mr. Hoge, of that State. Witness said that he was appointed to Mr. Hoge for examination, but that one had already been made. Admiral Porter then stated that he was informed that if the case appointed in the proposed law if the case appointed

THE MORMON QUESTION.

The Committee on Territories, having under consideration the Cullom bill for the suppression of polygamy in Utah, have found an interesting occupation in examining certain "Gentile" witnesses relative to that institution. Mr. John F. Taggart, the United States Assessor for the Territory, and Mr. J. H. Beadles, late editor of the Corinne Reporter, the witnesses in question, agree, in the leading facts, with most of the statements of other observers. They state that the religious despotism still exercised over all Mormons by Brigham Young is of so searching and painful a character that independent free action on the part of individual Mormons, men or women, hostile to polygamy, is not to be expected. The mass of them do not fear religiously to doubt the authority of the Mormon Church over body and soul, and being thus held fast in spiritual bondage Brigham Young may say with truth that they act of their own free will without physical coercion, when none is needed or dares the blindest obedience. Mr. Taggart describes the case of a woman, employed by an Episcopalian minister as housekeeper, who, after evincing the utmost horror at the thought of consenting to her Mormon husband, after fleeing, hiding, weeping, and entreating to be rescued from him, had only to be told that the President (Young) would send for her, when she cried "All right, go," and was led away a willing, humiliated, sacrifice. This subjection is attributed, in part, to the fearful oaths taken in the ceremony of endowment, of which few women know any thing until they are married. It is said that the violation of the oath of one order," says Mr. Taggart, "the penalty is to have the throat cut from ear to ear, and of another to have the heart torn out," &c. A distinction is made also between the sins after Christ's blood atones for them, which are generally those not vital to Mormonism, and those which the offender's own blood must atone for. Mr. Taggart, who commends himself to our credence by informing us that Brigham Young says he is "the big bull," also intimates that these blood atonements are still a vital feature of Mormon faith, and of their practice so far as they dare resort to it.

Justice is administered in Utah through a class of elected officers known to the Gentiles as Judges, but to the Mormons as Bishops. The Mormons being thirty to one of the entire population, elect their Bishops as civil Judges, and hence the Judges are only believers. Mormons themselves, but between Gentiles and Mormons, are tried before these Mormon Bishops. They are generally polygamists, and one of the most trenchant features of the Cullom bill is that which renders polygamists ineligible as Judges. So complete is the spiritual despotism exercised by the Bishops over the people, that it is capable of exacting them wholly from Gentile industry. Since the Pacific Railroad has gone through, the formation of the "Zion's Co-operative Mercantile Institution," and the instructions of the Bishops to the people to trade only at Mormon stores, have been so effectually enforced that the Gentile stores have been bankrupted. Seventeen Gentile stores in Salt Lake City have stopped within eight months, and in other towns, where a year ago ten or twelve Gentile stores had started, there are now but one or two, or none whatever. The opening of the Pacific Railroad, instead of hastening Gentile influence among them, has led to such a tightening of the lines of spiritual despotism that Gentile access to Mormon commerce and business is rapidly becoming impracticable. Intercourse with Mormons is absolutely at the past of their women. These facts seem to entirely dispel the hope indulged by some that the attrition of Christian society would prove a solvent and cure for at least the polygamic feature.

Indeed, upon any theological or Scriptural basis Christianity stands at a much greater disadvantage in controverting polygamy than monogamy as the Mormon Apostle, so called, itself. For while Mr. Colfax succeeded in digging up an earlier revelation against polygamy from the Mormon Bible, he could have found nothing bearing in that direction in the Old Testament. Monogamy, coming into our civilization, like the arts, philosophy, and republicanism, wholly from Greek and Roman source, stands in antagonism with the entire history and existence of the Hebrew tribes, and consistently with the examples of their patriarchs and precepts of their sacred records in this respect. The high standard of moral contagion to polygamy, assumed by Christendom in all the centuries since Christ, and Protestant—from the early centuries of the church to the present time, in the absence of any Scriptural injunction against it, is a significant evidence of the immense superiority of the genius of the Christian Church, whose aggregate conscience is more powerful as an influence than any one of the many sources from which it has been educated. Hence, while the average Christian conscience is stirred to a deeper abhorrence by polygamy than by almost any other form of barbarism, it finds itself involuntarily recoiling to reiterate all the charges of human nature against this institution; while, on the contrary, the Mormon missionaries stand ready at all times to defend their practices by the utterances of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob are given. The normal quantity is given from four to five parts in 10,000. It was found that the school-rooms in Brooklyn ranged from 10 to 40 parts in 10,000. Some of the worst in this respect were the small schools in private houses, which had no adequate means of ventilation. The theatres averaged about as much carbonic acid as the schools. Since, in the theatres, the lamps contributed far more of the gas than the breathe, it would follow that the air of the schools could not have been equally purified by the gas without becoming much more largely impregnated with animal exhalations. A number of other air qualities analyzed were the pestreres of the Bowery Theatre, which contained 70 parts of carbonic acid in 10,000; or fifteen times the natural quantity. The Olympic showed 80 parts; Bowery, 60 parts; the French Opera, 20; Wood's, with a slim audience, 6 parts; Tammany, 31 parts; and the Bowery, on another occasion, from 76 to 250. Contrary to the current impression, it was found, in petty instances, that the carbonic acid gas, though heavier than air, existed in large quantities near the ceiling, where it was born.o by the heated currents. In the Hamilton Club Rooms, 31 parts in 10,000 were found at the ceiling, when only 10 existed near the floor. In Plymouth Church, from 6 to 20 parts per 10,000 were the average. Careful analyses were made at over 100 samples of that taken from the air in public rooms where the people gradually deposited, taking care to avoid localities which would furnish the kind of dust most likely to be breathed by audiences and large masses of people. It was found that the deposit of the Sunday, as for the samples was the same; the only difference of moment being that those gathered in higher localities consisted of smaller particles. Of these the report says:

"It was the dust of the streets in its finer or coarser particles, according to the height at which it was collected, and was composed of sand, of organic and mineral fragments of earth, of hair, of cotton and woolen fibres, of particles from coal and manufactories, of epithelial scales, of starch, of hay, of straw, of particles of leather, of fragments of wood, of the excrement of insects, of the excrement of horses, of the excrement of dogs, of the excrement of human beings, of the hair of human beings, of the hair of dogs, of the hair of horses, of the hair of cats, of the hair of rats, of the hair of mice, of the hair of squirrels, of the hair of goats, of the hair of sheep, of the hair of cows, of the hair of oxen, of the hair of camels, of the hair of bears, of the hair of buffaloes, of the hair of deer, of the hair of moose, of the hair of elephants, of the hair of tigers, of the hair of lions, of the hair of monkeys, of the hair of apes, of the hair of seals, of the hair of whales, of the hair of porpoises, of the hair of sea-lions, of the hair of walruses, of the hair of hippopotami, of the hair of rhinoceroses, of the hair of giraffes, of the hair of zebras, of the hair of antelopes, of the hair of hyenas, of the hair of jackals, of the hair of foxes, of the hair of wolves, of the hair of leopards, of the hair of panthers, of the hair of ocelots, of the hair of jaguars, of the hair of ant-eaters, of the hair of armadillos, of the hair of sloths, of the hair of kangaroos, of the hair of opossums, of the hair of coatis, of the hair of racoons, of the hair of weasels, of the hair of minks, of the hair of skunks, of the hair of otters, of the hair of beavers, of the hair of porcupines, of the hair of hedgehogs, of the hair of moles, of the hair of shrews, of the hair of bats, of the hair of lemurs, of the hair of sloths, of the hair of ant-eaters, of the hair of armadillos, of the hair of pangolins, of the hair of aard-varks, of the hair of manis, of the hair of ornithorhynchus paradoxus, of the hair of echidna hystrix, of the hair of echidna setosa, of the hair of echidna bruijnii, of the hair of echidna nova-guineæ, of the hair of echidna lawesii, of the hair of echidna aculeata, of the hair of echidna reclusa, of the hair of echidna athertoni, of the hair of echidna multiaculeata, of the hair of echidna semiaculeata, of the hair of echidna inermis, of the hair of echidna tachyglossa, of the hair of echidna setifera, of the hair of echidna histrix, of the hair of echidna longirostris, of the hair of echidna brevirostris, of the hair of echidna nasuta, of the hair of echidna hystricosa, of the hair of echidna villosa, of the hair of echidna mitchelli, of the hair of echidna ferox, of the hair of echidna hirsuta, of the hair of echidna cristata, of the hair of echidna spinosa, of the hair of echidna armata, of the hair of echidna acanthion, of the hair of echidna calcarata, of the hair of echidna stenorhyncha, of the hair of echidna leptorhyncha, of the hair of echidna platyrhyncha, of the hair of echidna gracilis, of the hair of echidna curta, of the hair of echidna tenuirostris, of the hair of echidna grandis, of the hair of echidna crassispina, of the hair of echidna longispina, of the hair of echidna brachyrhyncha, of the hair of echidna obesa, of the hair of echidna ramosa, of the hair of echidna ramosissima, of the hair of echidna ramosissima, of the hair of echidna ramosissima

Review of Rev. Dr. Hatfield's Recent Lecture.

Why the Agitation of Woman's Suffrage is Not Pernicious

To the Editor of The Chicago Tribune:

Rev. Dr. Hatfield delivered a lecture in St. Paul's Reformed Episcopal Church, in this city, last Thursday evening, on the question "The Pertinent Affairs of the Agitation of Woman's Suffrage," from a large part of which we respectfully dissent. Although D. D.'s may pronounce and agitate up and down, and fractured doctrine with most aggravating coolness, it has often happened in the world's history that when they had a mouthful of polonius, pa must be hard, dyspeptic meals and banging the table, they could not find on their bands, and the result was they got into the ditch. Now we propose to show, when they keep within the precincts of their professional spheres, one of that circle we claim the right to admonish and even reconcile criticism. We have yet to learn that any good cause suffers from agitation, and admitting that the Rev. Dr.'s view of the case is tenable and he only right one, it is not amiss with increased force under the continued attempts of fair dominion.

"Truth crushed to earth will rise again."

The eternal years of God are hers.

On the other hand, it is the insatiable scream of a tyrant and bad cause to gag agitation and shrink from the glowing crucible of free, unbiased investigation. It is the cry of despots hushed to silence; hence, with her characteristic boldness, Miss Anthony, not slavery shrieked many against "the pernicious agitation of the question," in her cause is founded on sound principles of right, and the principles of right being eternal and immutable under the manipulation of river, must ever triumph.

"While error writhes in mortal pain,
While truth is crushed to earth in vain."

We conclude, therefore, that the only station to be despised is that which opposes agitation, for true, fearless, honest and indignant assertion for clear, feasible principles, and the most searching and discursive comments upon the character and acts of men, is necessary to the life of liberty.

We take exception to the speech of the lecturer, inasmuch as it is not in accordance with the facts of history. In the case of Wilberforce, he says: "Nearly every speaker in favor of abolition of slavery, and every writer was denounced as political enemies." Well, who says otherwise? Is it necessary to the abolition of slavery, or woman suffrage, or any other reform, that every speaker in favor of women's freedom should be denounced? Is it necessary to make it so? Is it necessary to make it so? Is it necessary to make it so

The "Chimere d'Ore" or "Golden Pigeon" of Verona is one of the old-fashioned Italian exteriors that disappearing before the invasion of railroads and telegraphs; while, like the beautiful and picturesque costumes of the peasantry, only to be met in some out-of-painting or "proof before letters." I say nothing in regard to the origin of its name, nor, indeed, anything connected with the establishment containing one in the least of pigeons, unless, perhaps, the unfortunate travelers who allowed themselves to be decoyed into the uncomfortable and dirty nest by that old bird or goop, the landlord, to be plucked with a facility as I address which, judging from the length of his beard, must have been prodigious. I had left Venice but a little after noon, and arrived in Verona a little after nine, not the least fatigued with five hours' travel through a rosy twilight and varied line of country. At 11 we were in the rondelle of the fortress,—white in the possession of the Austrians, the strongest in Europe and procured by the gnostrisseral (with Manins, Pasaleons, and Lipsaxo) which stopped the victorious legions of Napoleon III. after Solferino and procured for Austria the peace of Villafranca. When the Tedeschi evacuated Venetia they dismantled the finest great fortress in Europe, and, as the Italians had the money to restore the works, the politics has not ...ome of its former strength.

I then an ...ment down with a pint of red ink, which the landlord put before me with a grin, telling me it was a choice native production, and, after a few words with some of their edge, I thanked him, and begged he would keep the rest, or drink it himself, as I had not ordered it, and was not going to contribute to the inhospitality. Then, as Alexander the great, or some such fellow, used to say, I made a noble supper. Bill of fare of sixty-colored grapeshot, and some novelty from, approaching as near to spiced petrification. I ignited a cigarette and set out for an after-dinner stroll.
